most formidable opposition to encounter, without any certain or permanent reliance upon the military.

A union, however, of all classes against the ultraists will still present a large majority of the French people as hostile to extreme opinions.

The intervention of the Government in the affairs of Italy, without a previous understanding with the Italian liberals, has been followed by consequences calculated to weaken the administration, and to furnish the opposition with the means of a powerful reaction. At the last advices the French armity had not entered Rome; and General Oudinot was in the embarrassing position of having to await the approach of the Austrians and Neapolitans, with the prospect of incurring the odium of appearing as their ally and of acting in concert with them against the Italian republicans. A solution of this difficulty, it would seem, is indispensable to the continuance of Louis Napoloon's administration.

The Parisian correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce in his last letter which contains one of those comprehensive groupings of events and particulars so characteristic of that intelligent observer, gives an account of the retirement of M. Faucher from the French Ministry a step to which he was driven by the Assembly. It appears that just previous to the election he had sent telegraphic despatches to the different provinces announcing the triumph of the government on vote of confidence and charging the miniority with having plotted a renewed of the insurrection of June in the event of their having carried the vote in the Assembly. This was denounced as an unwarrant.
